A recent word to describe image manipulation is _post-production._ (The _post_ part of _post-production_ describes the step in which the image is made final, while the _-production_ part means "production.") Putting it in full, a post-production workflow creates a workflow for post-production and includes the following five steps: * Pre-production: Planning and the initial production of the image, including the concept, what type of final image will be produced, and the technical requirements (e.g., the project's print size). * Production: The actual production of the image, including the layout, photography, and editing. * Post-production: The post-production steps in which the images are made final. This includes the types of printing, such as lithography or digital printing (see Chapter 6), but may also include other final touches, such as a title, copyright, and the like. * Packaging: The last step in the workflow, which includes printing and shipping the prints for the final image. * Retention: The last step in the workflow, which includes archiving the artwork and other materials and keeping track of usage of the artwork. ## Digital Camera A digital camera is similar to a digital camera, but the image sensor in the digital camera is an electronic device rather than a film-based device that captures light and makes a print. Many of the best digital cameras have replaced the familiar slide film camera with electronic devices. Digital cameras, like slide film cameras, produce images on film because of the size of the image sensor, which is tiny. To create a digital image, the image sensor records the intensity of light in a series of tiny dots or pixels. Digital cameras and their predecessors, referred to as point-and-shoot cameras, have replaced the film camera as the industry standard. These days, most smartphones (including many popular models from Apple, Samsung, and the like) have the same image quality as a point-and-shoot camera.

The present invention relates to a slot machine and a gaming machine which indicates the winning number via a medium. A slot machine (hereinafter, referred to as a slot machine) is designed to operate in various ways according to a winning of a player. Slot machines having the same gambling characteristics are installed in gaming halls, for example, but the winning number or the winning ratio differs each machine. In a general slot machine, the winning number or the winning ratio (hereinafter, referred to as the "winning") does not display. It is determined by detecting the stop of rotating a spinning reel. The winning is determined when a predetermined winning number or winning ratio is detected. If the winning number is detected in a "numpad", a winning indicating reel is rotated, and the winning display device is lit so as to indicate the winning. There are two types of display devices: the flashing display device for flashing to indicate the winning by lighting; and the display device for displaying when the slot machine is inactive, and the display device for displaying the winning when the slot machine is active. The flashing display device flashes by reversing the direction in which the display device of the slot machine is displayed when the rotation of the motor stops. The display device has a power consumption of the order of 100-200 mA when it flashes. On the other hand, when it displays, the power consumption is at the order of 200-500 mA. On the other hand, the display device for displaying on the slot machine when the slot machine is inactive does not flash. If the display device is lit when the slot machine is inactive, the display device may be damaged by an impact or pressure from a button or a depressing lever during the following operation. The display device for displaying on the slot machine when the slot machine is active does not flash. If the display device is lit when the slot machine is inactive, the display device may be damaged by an impact or pressure from a button or a depressing lever during the following operation. In some slot machine, it is difficult to display the winning on a display device because of the decoration of the walls of the gaming hall, a space on the display device for the winning, and so on. In other slot machine, there are many parts which require attention. When the display device is lit to indicate the winning, there are cases where this makes the hall darker. The display device for displaying the winning when the slot machine is inactive may be damaged
